Wind power is good idea

As a fairly new "transplant" from the East, I have come to love the open spaces and scenic beauty of my new home. As such, I have developed a keen interest in how we can improve the economic climate for the state while preserving the air, water and land resources that are so precious. I was therefore thrilled to read Dave Anderton's article this morning regarding the Wyoming wind power farm.

I hope that more of Utah's leaders will see the benefits of this type of renewable and consider wind power as a viable means of striking that economic-environment balance.

I may be new to the West, but it seems that as Utah residents, we should support any and all technologies, particularly wind power, that can help us maintain our water and open spaces while providing the energy we need to remain productive.
